

On permissions to use third-party material in publication

The authors must obtain the written permission from the rightsholder in order to legally reuse any copyrighted material, such as text excerpts, maps, illustrations, figures, illustrations, tables and other third-party material, including the web sources. This need usually arises for review articles when using the material from foreign journals. The form of using the material must be agreed with the rightsholder. This is important for the editors in order to protect the Journal from copyright infringement

If you are not sure who to contact for permission, you can first apply to the publisher of the work that contains the fragment, that you use. On the websites of modern foreign journals, there is a section "Request permissions" (Permissions, Reprints and Permissions), by going to which you can find out the conditions for permissions obtaining.

When requesting permission to use the material from third party in the "Geosystems of Transition Zones", we ask you to request non-exclusive rights to reproduce the material in the indicated article and the Journal in print and electronic form throughout the entire period of work, without time limits, since the articles in the Journal, including their online versions, are archived.

Do not assume that the absence of a response to request for permission from the rightsholder to re-use copyrighted material gives you the right to use it. In these cases, it is better to remove the material from the work or try to find an alternative.

When is permission not required?

Written permission may not need to be obtained when:

- Using public domain works not protected by copyright, as well as the material, for which copyright has expired.
- Using open access content published under a CC-BY user license, as well as open access material published under other types of user licenses, depending on the nature of reuse (for example, nonprofit use). Permissions vary depending on the license type, it is necessary to check the license details carefully before reusing the material.
- Creating a figure, diagrams or tables from the data that was not previously published in figure, diagrams or tables format.

If there is borrowed material elements in the manuscript, the editors would like to receive a confirmation of permission obtaining from the authors in the form of a table:

Permission
